Democratic Debate Is Intense, Personal

By David S. Broder Washington Post Service

NEW YORK - The Democratic presidential candidates clashed Wednesday night in the most personal and intense debate of the campaign.
The candidates disagreed on arms control, military interven-tion, the Middle East and domesne economic policy as they fought for advantage in Tuesday's New York primary.

Walter F. Mondale, the most aggressive of the three, challenged Gary Hart, Democras of Colorado, to "pull down" television ads warning that Mr. Mondale's policies could lead to thousands of U.S. casualties in a Central American struggle.

He leaned across the table toward Mr. Hart and said, "Why do you run those ads that suggest I'm out trying to kill kids when you know better?"

Mr. Hart responded by criticiz-ing Mr. Mondale's foreign policy judgment from Vietnam until now and voicing his bitterness about Mr. Mondale's attacks on his arms control and civil rights

"Why have you questioned my commitment to arms control and civil rights when you know that I have just as much commitment to both of those as you do?" Mr. The Reverend Jesse L. Jackson, while frequently interjecting him-self as a peacemaker in the exchanges between the other two, also criticized their records. He said he would do more fighting for social justice" and "taking risks for peace" than

WASHINGTON - President Ronald Reagan said Wednesday that it would be "most unwise" for the United States to move its embassy in Israei from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem, and he strongly suggested that he would veto legislation in Congress to require such a step.

In an interview, Mr. Reagan said a bill requiring the embassy to be moved "should never have been introduced in Congress." He said the disposition of Jerusalem, the West Bank of the Jordan River and other areas "must be negotiated between Israel and the Arab coun-

The meeting with the president was part of a series of interviews by The New York Times with all the presidential candidates.

Mr. Reagan, looking relaxed, alluded to the presidential campaign when he declined several times to specify his plans for future hudget cuts and revisions in the tax system. These were among the points he

 In defending his administra-tion's covert assistance to rebels in Nicaragua, he said he saw "no dichotomy" between U.S. support for the government of El Salvador and its support for those seeking to overthrow the government in Nicaragua. Both efforts, he said, were aimed at bringing about "democratic rule. • Mr. Reagan said that demographic changes were bringing a "day of reckoning" for federal programs that provided benefits to individual people, including Medi-care and Social Security. He said he would seek to "reorder those programs" if re-elected, but promised not to "pull the rug out from under anyone who is presently dependent" on them. · He said that, if re-elected, he wanted to simplify the tax structure to "broaden the base" of federal revenues. He said this would be done by taxing people who are now "totally tax free" or who are paying "well below what they should be paying." Again, he declined to be specific, saying. "This is a study that has to be made." On military spending, Mr. Reagan said the reduction in the rate of increase that he recently accepted would defer but not eliminate his plans for weapons systems and manpower. Other savings are to be achieved by changing certain

"government practices," he said.

The president said that tensions with the Soviet Union "are frankly more evident in rhetoric than they are in actuality." He said he was "hopeful" that Moscow would resume nuclear arms talks but added: "We're not going to sit here and negotiate with ourselves while they sit out there not participating, waiting to see what we'll

As he has before, Mr. Reagan repeated that "progress was made" in achieving a peaceful reconciliation in recent talks in Lausanne, Switzerland. The talks broke off earlier this month with participants saying they were at a stalemate. "I still have to say right now the Canadian Sealers: Endangered Species

Boycott of Pelts Undercuts Islanders' Fragile Existence

By Douglas Martin

New York Times Service CAP-AUX-MEULES, Quebec - For the 14,000 residents of the Magdalen Islands in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, virtually all of life's necessities must be imported and the only industry is a money-losing government-subsidized salt mine. Seventy percent of the population is unemployed at this time of year.

Now the islands' hardscrabble fishermen cannot even count on the seals they have killed for centuries. A yearlong European boycott of scal pelts, a boycott of Canadian fish products by British supermarkets have dried up a once-thriving market. "The seal hunt is on its last legs," said Dan Morast, a leader of the International Fund for Animal Welfare, the organizer of the fish boycott. The fish boycott has spurred the British Columbia Fisheries Association and National Sea Products Ltd., the country's biggest fishing company, to demand a halt to the hunt. In Ottawa, the ministries of trade and external affairs, which are concerned that the protests will burt sales of Canadian fish products, are fighting the Fisheries Ministry, which backs the sealers. Even the Canadian Sealers' Association has asked for a ban on the killing of the youngest seals, the whitecost pups, as a tactic for salvaging what is left of the hunt. For years, a majority of the Canadian public surveyed in polls have opposed the seal hunt. As a result, a fragile way of life on these rocky, virtually treeless islands is threatened. Fewer than 500 seal pups have been slaughtered this year, compared with tens of thousands in some previous years. On the islands, fortunes balance on cod, herring, lobster and seals. Now the seals, despite a population at its highest level in years, seem to be gone. Every day, people sit around kitchen tables puzzling about what

The two men tell how important sealing is to a cycle that has existed for generations. They tell of danger, blinding snowstorms, friends killed. They tell of the strain of dragging 300 pounds of pelts for three miles over ice. They tell of each losing as much as $3,000 a

Genscher Criticizes U.K. Position

BONN (Renters) - West Germany criticized on Britain Thursday for stopping a payment to the European Community and backed the idea of changing community rules so that no individual member would have the power of veto, a power that has been largely responsible for the community's continuing deadlock.
Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, in an interview with a West

German newspaper group made public by his ministry, said London's move "creates a serious situation. It constitutes a grave hardening of the British position which can only make unity more difficult." However, he added that "I do not see London on the way out of Europe."

Britain's decision to refuse payment of $140 million was described Wednesday by European Commission officials as illegal, and diplomats said the government of Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher could face an action in the European Court.

Soviet Assails Japanese-Chinese Talks

MOSCOW (AP) — The Soviet Communist Party newspaper Pravda asserted Thursday that Chinese leaders "grossly distorted Soviet foreign policy" in recent talks with Prime Minister Yasuhiro Nakasone of Japan. In an article highly critical on Mr. Nakasone's visit to Beijing, Pravda also asserted that Mr. Nakasone used the talks "to draw China into the military-strategie Japanese-American alliance.

It said that Japan was trying to "prepare the ground for a gradual integration of China into the economic structure of the Western world and to raise obstacles in the way of normalization of Chinese-Soviet relations." Pravda's comments followed the conclusion this week of the fourth round of Soviet-Chinese talks on normalizing relations.

Nurse Convicted in 12 U.S. Deaths

RIVERSIDE, California (UPI) - Robert Diaz, a nurse, was convicted Thursday of murdering 12 elderly patients at two rural hospitals in 1981 with massive doses of a heart-regulating drug. The verdict came in one of the most complicated medical and legal cases in California history.

Judge John Barnard of the Superior Court handed down the verdict a week after testimony and evidence concluded in the nonjury trial, which began last Oct. 31. Judge Barnard also found special circumstances of multiple murders and could sentence Mr. Diaz to death in the gas chamber. The penalty phase of the trial is scheduled to begin April 9. Mr. Diaz, 45, was charged with murder after a series of about 60 sudden and mysterious deaths of patients surfaced at hospitals in three further acts of armed aggression southern California counties. He was ultimately accused of killing 12

Clark, acolina — At least 62 persons were killed and almost 700 injured when cording to White House and other 24 iomadoes cut through the Caroadministration officials.

Mr. McFarlane has, however made his staff into a more powerful bureaucratic instrument on day-today affairs.

The most McFarlane can do on the big questions like Soviet affairs, Central America and the Middle East," a White House official said, "is set up temporary fences be-tween the elephants to keep them. for a few days, from trampling all over each other." The "elephants" are Secretary of State George P. Shultz and Defense Secretary Caspar W. Weinberger. Their personal relations continue to be described as strained, and their policy views bounce off each other with regularity.

The source of Mr. MeFarlane's power is knowledge of substance and an understanding of how the hureaucracy works, not a personal relationship with President Ronald Reagan. The personal connection is what Mr. Clark, Mr. Weinberger, Mr. Shultz and senior White House aides have that Mr. McFarlane

"The president wants differences zaton. between his two principal cabinet that still leaves basic differences between Shultz and Weinberger unresolved and prevents the adoption of consistent policies."

Thus, Mr. Shultz has succeeded in getting Mr. Reagan to tone down his anti-Soviet rhetoric and press improved relations, but Mr. Weinberger has succeeded in preventing agreement on compromises with Moscow.

For example, Mr. Shultz proposed and gained presidential ap-proval in late January on a plan for gradually shifting most of the marines from Lebanon, but when the situation in Beirut began deterio-rating rapidly in February, Mr. Weinberger was able to convince Mr. Reagan to take them all ont in a few weeks' time.

Shultz Says U.S. May Drop Observance Of SALT-2 Limits When Treaty Ends

By Oswald Johnston Los Angeles Times Service

WASHINGTON - Secretary of State George P. Shultz said Wednesday that the United States may abandon next year its policy of observing the limits of the unratifted second strategic arms limitation treaty, known as SALT-2.

Mr. Shultz stressed that so far the Reagan administration is holding to its policy of observing those limits so long as the Soviet Union does likewise, but he added that the policy is not "forever." He said the policy could be abandoned when the treaty expires at the end of

U.S. Army Rains Medals On Invaders of Grenada

The Associated Press WASHINGTON — The U.S. Army handed out 8,612 medals rewarding individual performance in the hrief Grenada invasion campaign although it never had more than about 7,000 officers and men on the island.

About 50 medals went to personnel who got no closer in the fighting than the Pentagon. Other awards were given to staff and rear-area support troops around the United issue of whether the administration States. The army defended the has decided if it would dismantle awards as a "valuable and effective leadership tool to huild unit morale and esprit." SAN SALVADOR - The rightist presidential candidate, Roberto d'Aubuisson, conceded Thursday a first-round election victory to a moderate, José Napoleón Duarte, and praised the Christian Democrat's campaign.

He urged the nation's election council to officially announce a runoff election between himself and Mr. Duarte, even though an official count is not expected until the weekend.

Mr. d'Aubuisson said his party, the Nationalist Republican Alliance, won about 31 percent of the vote Sunday and would seek a coalition for the runoff with four other major conservative parties that participated.

A Standoff in Salvador

Prematurely, even before the returns were in. President Reagan proclaimed El Salvador's election a victory of freedom over tyranny. The more realistic reading of a continuing process is that the first round was a standoff for democracy. The candidate most committed to democracy failed to get a majority: be'll be tested again in a tricky runoff next month and.

if he wins, by the leadership be can provide. Jose Napoleon Duarte, a Christian Democrat, won 45 percent of the vote, by his party's count. That same tally gives 30 percent to Roberto d'Auhuisson, whose ARENA Party vows death to Communist guerrillas and equates Christian Democracy with communism. Mr. Duarte's chances now depend on splitting the rightist vote that went to the traditional, less bloody-minded National Conciliation Party.

The real pity is that Mr. Duarte cannot reach out to democrats siding with the guerril-las in Salvador's civil war. Fearing for their safety, they boycott the vote. They also broke, or were forced to hreak, a promise not to challenge the balloting with violence. On both sides of the divide, democrats are hostages to extremists. The best argument for Mr. Duarte is that his election might yet preserve a path to the elusive center and to negotiation one day.

The Reagan administration so mistrusts any opening to the left that it stands in serious danger of misleading the right. Now is the time to make clear that Mr. Duarte alone can still persuade Americans that there remains a chance to advance democracy and human rights in El Salvador. In Congress, if not the adounistration, there are limits to the kind of regime the United States will support.

Mr. d'Auhuisson and his gun-toting allies believe otherwise. They dismiss even Secretary of State George Shultz's warnings as a bluff, a sop to liberals, mere election-year palaver. cause they pay only lip service to democracy in El Salvador, they cynically assume that Mr. Reagan is doing the same. They think American prestige is so fundamentally committed to defeating the Salvadoran left that withdrawal of aid is unthinkable

Let them note that even Mr. Reagan's urgent appeals have failed to win bipartisan approval of $61 million in emergency aid. According to Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, a majority of House Democrats now oppose any further military assistance, especially since the Pentagon confirms that about half the arms in guerrilla hands are captured or purchased American weapons. It would elinch their argument if Mr. d'Aubuisson were to achieve or claim victory at the ill-managed polls.

The first purpose of this election was always to persuade Americans that El Salvador's government continues to deserve sympathy and support. Having prescribed the election, the administration should not hesitate to try to influence the result.

Meese Should Withdraw

If Edwin Meese were magnificently quali-fied to be attorney general of the United States, it might be worth keeping his nomination on hold while a special prosecutor decides whether be should be charged with a crime. But he is not.

Even if he should win vindication after the weeks and months the investigation will take, be would still have far to go to qualify for Senate confirmation. Let Mr. Meese seek vindication - but let him withdraw his name.

Charges can he answered, and perhaps Mr. Meese can answer those against him. There is evidence suggesting that financial favors were traded for federal offices, that he knew about or had a hand in ohtaining Carter campaign documents in 1980, and that be received undue favoritism in a military reserve promotion.

He may convince the prosecutor with repeated claims of faulty memory, both when he filed incomplete disclosure statements and now. But think bow witless that would sound in someone supposedly qualified to be the nation's chief law enforcement officer. After telling the prosecutor that he acted unknowingly, be would have to satisfy the Senate that be would be a sharp Justice chief. The tension is ton great.

Attorney General William French Smith did his duty in asking a court in Washington to appoint an independent lawyer with full power to look into the charges. Appropriately, he asked that the lawyer's mandate be broad enough to address all accusations.

But it is hard to see how Mr. Meese can quickly persuade even a mildly skeptical pros-ecutor that he was oblivious to the legal implications of the favors given and returned

Consider his promotion to colonel in the Army's active reserve. The Defense Department found the promotion improper because he had not fulfilled the training requirements, yet it exonerated Mr. Messe, who had made a special point of wanting no special treatment. Yet if he knew the qualifications and knew he lacked them, how could be not know he had gotten special treatment?

And if he knew, how should the prosecutor interpret the unusual reappointment of the chief of Army reservists who helped Mr. Meese? If the prosecutor finds no willful misuse of authority -- only innocence to the point of naivete - what should the Senate conclude about his capacity to serve as a sophisticated crime-fighter? And of his ability to set the legal and ethical tone for an entire administration?

Mr. Reagan's loyalty to his longtime aide and friend is commendable in personal terms. But it ignores the public's interest in avoiding paralysis in the administration of justice. Mr. Smith is eager to leave. Still worse for the department's effectiveness, Edward Shmults, the deputy attorney general, and other top aides have left. A major department of government will be left idling in neutral new are investigation and confirmation and confirmation are complete. By proposing a candidate of unchallenged ability, the president would serve Justice, justice and the public.

Jerusalem and the Embassy

The American position not to explicitly recognize Jerusalem as Israel's capital obviously is founded on major political considerations.
Islamic emotionalism on the issue of someday gaining sovereignty not only over the sites in Jerusalem boly to Moslems but also over all of the city is deep and intense. The guiding U.S. view has always been that it is better to live with the unique anomaly of keeping an embassy in a noncapital than it is to risk harm to American interests in the Islamic world by doing what custom requires.

Some regard this position as craven. It is a position, though, that is based on the kind of practical weighing of interests that nations always engage in when trying to decide what best serves their own interests. An embassy in Tel Aviv may hurt Israeli sensitivities, and certainly it forces the American ambassador to log a lot of extra travel hours. But it is something that can be endured. Adopting the alternative course and moving the embassy to Jerusalem would, on the other hand, create an array of problems for the United States in much if not all of the Islamic world with which it must also try to maintain good relations. The bill in Congress to move the U.S. Embassy to Jerusalem, whatever its motivations, would, if enacted, cause conceivably grievous harm to American interests. Keeping things as they are is by no means intolerable: trying to change them could be explosive.

Washington was not really expecting Francois Mitterrand to so clearly manifest his will-ingness to go to Moscow. The news was even more surprising since the Kremlin had made it ain that it would not help Ronald Reagan in his re-election bid by agreeing to a U.S.-Soviet summit. Summit: An Eager Reagan Is Put on Hold Washington — The mere thought of it brings gleams to White House eyes: a pre-election "working summit" with Konstantin Chernenko, winding up with a simple, interim agree-ment to put a ceiling on the most destabilizing of nuclear weapons, the intercontinental ballistic missile. You would be foolhardy to make book on it. But some administration officials by no means rule out the possibility. When I say "some," let me offer one measure of the White House appetite.

When Jimmy Carter's national security adviser, Zbigniew Brzezinski, recently suggested on a tele-vision talk show that Mr. Chernenko, no less than Ronald Reagan, might see political profit in an early summit and a modest strategic arms-control agreement, one of the first calls he received the next day was from Ronald Reagan. The president was interested enough in the proposal to send his chief negotiator for Strategic Arms Reductions Talks, Edward Rowney, for a chat with Mr. Brzezinski. Later, Mr. Brzezinski spent an hour and a half with the entire START negotiating team. This is bipartisanship above and beyond the general practice of an administration not given to taking counsel from Carter people.

The Brzezinski formula is so simple, hy his reckoning that the two top men could work it out without lower-level preliminaries. It would combine a Soviet offer to limit both sides to 1,800 missile launchers with a U.S. proposal for a ceiling of 7,000 nuclear warheads. This would hardly amount to a giant step in arms reduction: The Russians would be cutting back their total launchers sizably while the United States would be allowed a small increase; the warhead numbers on both sides would come down marginally.

U.S. negotiators see one big hitch. In the START discussions that broke off last December,

By Philip Geyelin

the "warhead" issue had been confounded by Soviet insistence on talking about "weapons." This blurs what the Americans see as a vital distinction between land-based or sea-launched ballistic missiles (which have a first-strike potential) and retalinterry nuclear counterforces.

The Russians could hrush that obstacle aside any time they felt it was in their interest to ease relations with the United States—and most of the evidence now points the other way. Undersecretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger, for one, sees a paralysis" in Soviet policy-making. Mr. Chernenko, Mr. Eagleburger says. "has yet to establish himself." With the real struggle for succession still under way, the tendency, says Mr. Eagleburger, is to seek refuge in a bureaucratically safe but substantively sterile hard line."

You can have your choice. Arthur Hartman, the U.S. ambassador to Moscow, recently expressed hope for reviving talks on a cultural and scientific exchange agreement that expired in 1980 and was not renewed after the Afghanistan invasion. From his soundings, Mr. Harrman sees a Soviet "readiness for dialogue" but sbares Mr. Eagleburger's doubts about a willingness to talk about hig questions, specifically arms control.

Armand Hammer, the chief executive officer of the Occidental Petroleum Corp., has been dealing with the Russians for 63 years. Writing in The New York Times (1HT, March 15), Mr. Hammer contends that Mr. Chernenko "has sent signals that he is ready to talk." He thinks a high-level group of Americans should be sent to Moscow to prepare the way for a summit meeting, "which I think must take place this spring."

On the other hand, American members of the so-called Dartmouth Group of Soviet and defense experts have just returned from their annual temperature-taking with their Soviet counterparts and report that the Russians "showed no interest in even probing for possible openings." One member of the group is quoted as saying that he had "never seen the atmosphere so bad."

Mr. Brzezinski's argument is that "economically [the Russians] are bust and ideologically they are so discredited that revolutionaries around the world don't look on them as a model." Military power, he argues, is the "only asset they have in competition with the United States ... and in terms of weapons development, they're about to lose their edge."

That is why he thinks the Russians might want to put a cap on at least a part of the arms race. Another reason, interestingly, is the same reason Mr. Eagleburger cites for his "paralysis" theory. Mr. Brzezinski believes the power struggle gives Mr. Chernenko a powerful monve for an early summit meeting to establish himself as an international figure.

The fact that the Soviet authorities would not even receive a personal letter from Ronald Reagan (which was 10 have been delivered by Brent Scowcroft, the chairman of the president's Commission on Strategie Forces, when he was recently in Mos-cow) is hardly encouraging. Yet some Soviet ex-perts say that only means the Russians are "playing bard 10 get."

That Mr. Reagan should have sent General Scowcroft as an emissary in the first place — and that be should have been so quick to telephone Mr. Brzezinski — suggests that Ronald Reagan, in election year 1984, is ready to deal.

the East Europeans. They are the

The Vienna negotiations, in 11 years, have not achieved any agreement. But neither are they pointless. Both sides have moved significantly. Now participants from the North At-lantic Treaty Organization countries are preparing a response to the latest Soviet offer, which includes behindthe-lines checkpoints to monitor force levels. The West considers the Soviet position an important but inadequate advance, and the offer is still on the table despite the breakdown of all other arms control talks. Evidently the Russians see some advantage in sustaining alliance-to-alliance negotiations, so as to keep hopes alive in Western Europe. But the Easterners seem even more determined to maintain their tight of direct participation, instead of leaving it to Moscow to face the West over their heads.

The most impressive gap between Soviet and Eastern attitudes now has developed in East Germany, still one of the most orthodox and closely involved members of the East bloc. A year ago, West European diplomats thought Moscow would promote frietion between East and West Germany as part of a campaign to frighten

Bonn out of accepting U.S. missiles. Nothing of the sort happened. Boan mancovered adroidly, offering a buge credit; East Berlin made clear it would not let relations between the confrontation. The recent, massive increase of emigration from East to West Germany has been East Berlin's side of the bargain.

No doubt Moscow could have forced East Berlin to stiffen and join in reviving Cold War fears. The fact that it did not shows it felt the cost that it did not shows it felt the cost would have been too high, both ecowould have been too high, both eco-nomically and in terms of more trouhle in its hloc, when it still has to worry about Poland.

The rising role of East Germany parallels the increasing influence of West Germany in the Atlantic alliance. There is not going to be any reunification in this generation, nor probably the next. But each side of the divided country has emerged again as a crucial partner in its camp. All the Communist regimes in Eastern Europe, with the possible exception of Czechoslovakia, bave become more acutely aware that their own national interests are not always the same as the Russians'. They make it clear now that Washington and Moscow are barely speaking. They have no inhibitions on cultivating relations with the United States, as well as with Western Europe. This is a matter of nuance, compared with the deep East-West split that remains. But it is an evolution of real importance. It is a fruit of detente that Washington underestimates. And it shows that even Irustrating talks with Moscow are worthwhile, for they loosen rigidities in the rest of the bloc. That is good for the United States, and it is vital for the East Europeans.

Senator Hart wants bargaining with the Soviet Union, is also opposed to the first-strike stance, and is somewhat harsher in what he says about the allies and their "nervous politicians" and "neutralist demonstrators." On Third World issues he is distinctly noninterventionist, saying, "Not every Third World problem is America's problem, for which there is an American solution." In struggles for local power, be asserts, "Neither our security nor the local population's cry for liberty is usually well served hy our attempts to impose our will on them." In this respect, Mr. Hart represents new ideas" only if we can call ideas new that have been around since the late 1950s and early 1960s. Criticisms of U.S. over-involvement in Third World affairs, of a certain megalomaniacal insistence hy Washington upon the relevance of everything everywhere to U.S. security, have long been making their way into American politics. They now re-emerge in the campaign of Gary Hart.

These ideas express what might reasonably be called a conservative view of history, and of what a country even as powerful as the United States can accomplish in shaping the ac-tions of others. The peculiarities of U.S. political debate have made them seem ideas of the left. Thus, so profoundly conservative a figure as George Kennan, the author in the 1940s of the policy of containment of Soviet power, and one of the earliest and most eloquent critics of Western appeasement of the U.S.S.R., is today treated routinely by the American right as "soft" on Communism and a dangerous radical. It is significant that Mr. Kennan was also long out of favor with the American liberal foreign-policy es-tablishment. For more than three decades U.S. policy has been in the hands of people with a very grand view of the American world role. These have been people on both left and right of the national political divide. Those on the left emphasized vast world reforms; the right took a both were convinced that the confrontation between Communism and Americanism was what history really

The Debate Is 'Shamelessly' Pro-Israel

BOSTON — Walter Mondale and Gary Hart are slugging it out right now on one key issue: who can do the most for Israel. Each promises to move the American Embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem if elected Though both bave been admirably faithful in their support for Israel over the years, each accuses the other of perfidy.

You might think the Jewish community would be pleased at such intense expressions of concern for Israel. There are a great many Jewish voters in New York, which bolds its presidential primary next week, and the candidates are obviously out for their approval. But the truth is that many American Jews are not bappy at this extrav-agant courting of their votes. In conversations in the last few days some have been uneasy and even angry at the phenomenon. They have called it. among other things, shameless politics, pandering, vulgar, stupid, insult-ing. What is going on here? The first thing to be said is that the

Mondale and Hart talk has precious little relevance to the real world in which Israel must act. The New York Times correspondent in Jerusalem. David Shipler, reports that Israelis view it all with detachment and a certain cynicism, seeing the competing promises as campaign gabble that is not likely to affect their lives.

The question of moving the embas-sy to Jerusalem is a good example of politics divorced from reality. Past candidates have pledged to make the move, but presidents bave not done so, and for good reasons. Israel is in control of a united Jerusalem and as a practical matter will more militarized view of things; but remain so indefinitely. No imaginable American political leader will favor redividing the city. So there is no need for practical action. The political symbol of Jerusalem keep their embassies in Tel Aviv. Teddy Kollek, the mayor of Jerusalem, has strongly resisted merely formal moves for similar reasons. Why arouse attention and animosity when the status quo is working well? The United States has a particular reason not to make Jerusalem a politieal and diplomatic issue. The greatest service America can do Israel is to help it find peace: a peace that would ease the Jewish state's heavy burden of military spending and psychologi-cal embattlement. Pressing the Jeru-salem issue would make a U.S. negotiating role that much more difficult. Many leaders of the American Jewish community see the Jerusalem question as an unnecessary distraction. Some of them privately urged Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan of New York not to press his bill calling for relocation of the embassy. But he has persisted, explaining that the leg-islation is needed as a sign of American support for Israel Is that argument a bealthy one, for Israel or for the American Jewish community? No rational person can doubt the commitment of the United States to the life and health of Israel. The increasing flow of aid and all the burnan ties between the two countries testify to that. Given the reality, a demand for reiterated reassurance might seem to reflect uncertainty rather than strength.

Jewish history has made realism an essential quality. Most American Jewish leaders are immensely practical men and women. Yet politicians evidently have the impression that they want to hear glowing fantasies about Israel, not realistic appraisals. One reason must be a kind of Gresham's competition. No group or leader wants to be seen lagging be-hind another in support for Israel. In private they criticize and disagree as anyone would on political issues. But in public they countenance no disagreement, and anyone who finds an Israeli policy less than perfect is likely to be called "anti-Israel."

Fantasy is bad for politics. When voters demand fantasies from politicians, they feel betrayed when the miracles do not happen — and then may demand more reassurances. It is time for Jewish community leaders to break this demeaning cycle in which they and the politicians are caught. The New York Times.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

India's Other Sikhs William Claiborne's report on Sikh revolt in Punjab ("Sikh Radical Warns New Delhi of Punjab Revolt," March 23) yet again offers the spe-cious and brittle theory that Sikh fundamentalism is sweeping that state and inspiring hundreds of fanatical youths. Much of your recent coverage on Punjah also seeks to profile Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale as a "Sikh Khomeini" surrounded by awed disciples. Such analysis is absurd and ludicrous. And the parallel Western reporters find with Shiite Iran is, to say the least, unfortunate. I am but one among thousands of prosperous and successful Sikhs who live all over India, not just in Punjab. You will find the flourishing Sikh the shadow of the Golden Temple in Amritsar but in far-flung areas such as Cochin, Bangalore, Calcutta. Bombay and Kanpur. Any thought of these well-entrenched Sikhs backing the call for autonomy by a hunch of misguided extremists — who are dis-torting the peaceful tenets of the Holy Book, the "Granth Sahib" - is wishful thinking.

Most Sikhs have no quarrel with their brother-community, the Hindus, as is evident hy numerous examples of intermarriage, and will staunchly support any official moves to ultimately put away the extremists of the Bhindranwale faction of the Akalı Dal. But legitimate demands such as acceding Chandigarh as the capital of Punjab and increasing the state's power ought to be granted.

No one needs to teach the Sikhs the value of "patriotism" - they remain Indians first and Sikhs next, If matters were ultimately to go wrong in Punjab, it would be the Sikhs elsewhere in the country who would suffer irreparably - not the Hindus, the Moslems, Christians, Jains or Parsis of India.

In Iraq, Both U.S., Soviet Are Welcome By Henry Kamm restored beginning in 1982, when that Baghdad reconsidered its atti-lran, having turned the tide of the tude toward the United States. New York Times Service

BAGHDAD --- Iraq has gradually achieved what is viewed by diplomats here as the feat of improving relations with the United States and the Soviet Union at the same time. Both developments, the diplo-

For Baghdad, Moscow served principally as the supplier of most of its military requirements. The war with Iran; particularly in its early phase, largely pitted Soviet arms wielded by Iraq against the U.S.-made weapons of Iran.

Moreover, Baghdad, a consistent advocate of all-out opposition to Israel and outspoken foe of the U.S. role in the Middle East, found common diplomatic interests with Moscow.

Iraq has not restored diplomatic relations with the United States, which it broke in 1967 over the Middle East war. U.S. diplomats function discreetly as a section of the Belgian Embassy, with limited access to Iraqi officials.

The relationship with the Soviet Union was the first to be affected by Iraq's invasion of Iran. Apparently because of concern over losing any possibility of influencing future events in Iran, the Soviet of Congress, pointing out that "the only oon-American whose portrain hangs from the halls of this chamber is Lafayette."

"Overall, the market is doing exceptionall well considering Wednesday's strong gain," said Marvin Katz of Sanford C. Bernstein & Co.
"This is the first time in a long while that the market hasn't given back 50 percent of its gains after a large runup like Wednesday."

Investors had several government reports to ponder. The Commerce Department reported its index of leading economic indicators climbed 0.7 percent in February, following a revised 1-percent surge in January. It was the 18th consecutive increase.

"The indicators were higher than expected and that could revive the fears of the economy overheating," said Michael Metz of Oppenheimer & Co. Picasso's Last Works: Better Late Than Ever

by John Russell

EW YORK - Posterity will be dumbfounded that we took so long to see the point of late Picasso. But now we can see "Picasso: The Last Years, 1963-1973" at the Guggenheim Museum (through May 6) not only in depth, but also in isolation, rather than as an appendage to one of the most glorious careers in 20th-centu-

What got into those people?" our successors will say. "They were there. The work was there. Picasso was not unknown. He poured the stuff out, and yet they took no notice."

Put like that, it does indeed sound absurd. Picasso, during the period in question, was in no sense a public figure; but in the public imagination, his place was already secure. Not only was his new work exhibited and published, hnt his private arrangements were known and discussed. As of 1958, he was the owner of the Château de Vauvenargues, a maestic mansion oot far from Aix-en-Provence. It turned out not to please him for long, though he prized it for its almost Spanis austerity and never thought of selling it).

In March 1961, at the age of 79, he became the husband of Jacqueline Roque, the beautiful young woman who had shared his life since 954. As of June 1961, they began to live in the house at Mougins, not far from the Mediterra-nean, where Picasso was to work with almost unbroken concentration until the day of his death. He saw few people, rarely went out and carried a burden of work that would have killed off many a man half his age. He was a legend, but a legend behind closed doors.

Yet there was really no mystery about the last years of Picasso, who died in April 1973. There was frustration, for many who would have wished to take up his time, but in terms of what really mattered - the work - the essential was known. The problem was that late Picasso was in no way a predictable continuanon of earlier Picasso. To those who had hoped to close the Picasso dossier once and for all when Picasso was 70, or at the most 75, it was a matter of continual exasperation.

What were they to say about paintings that were sloshy, approximate and in many cases fully life-size? What was to be done about etchings that came out in ever-greater profusion and were ever-more persistently genital in their subject matter? Art historians who had for 30 years been wrestling Picasso to the ground in terms of the masterpieces of his earlier years were very hard put to accommodate the flood of new work that came out year by year and seemed to be almost joyfully unedited. How could they not notice the change that occurred in his work after he was 75, and how could they not regret it?

Besides, late Picasso did not fit into the category of "late" art as it is generally understood. Late Michelangelo means the Rondanini Pietà in Milan, a sculpture that is simplified, pared away and not so much unfinished as beyond finishing. Late Titian means an elegiac mode of painting in which, once again, we feel that the death of the artist cannot long be delayed. In late watercolors by Cézanne, we feel that the physicality of the medium is about to vanish altogether, just as it all but vanishes in the last works of Matisse. Late Picasso, by comparison with these, is like a trumpeting elephant on the rampage.

Indeed, late Picasso could not be ignored.

Sometimes it was given no more than a token acceptance, as bappened in the great retrospec-tive at New York's Museum of Modern Art in 1980. But in that particular case, most visitors were so gorged by the time they got to the topmost rooms that they were beyond caring whether late Picasso was there or not.

In Europe there were museums - Basel's, above all - that took on the challenge, but most of them continued to see late Picasso in terms of an annex that could be cut short or discarded without serious loss. Quite apart from anything else, it was time that Picasso got out of the way and allowed a later generation

Late Picasso stuck around, though. Quite free from the sovereign thrift and the flawless overall control of earlier Picasso, the work went its own way. It had its own weight, its own momentum and its own ambitions. It had a variety that was quite simply prodigious.

There were people who, for one reason or mother, found it inconvenient; but eventually, in the 1980s, it has turned out to have an enormous influence on young painters the world over. For the first time in many years, the impact of Picasso on those trying to find themselves in paint has been liberaring, rather

The headlong brushwork, the tumultuous narrative element, the readiness to take any and every risk that came along, the comempt for taboos of no matter what kind — all have become precious to a new generation of painters, from Malcolm Morley, now 50, to Julian Schnabel, almost 20 years younger.

Whereas the masterpieces of his earlier years have come to seem both remote and daunting, late Picasso has, for the generation that came of age around 1975, a direct and heady appeal. It is as if he had stepped out of the day before sterday and become part of today.

n painting, late Picasso means images that are meaty, forthright, high and free in color and quite often slapdash in appearance. Where once he had done as he liked with painting, it now seemed as if painting were doing as it liked

In drawing and printmaking, late Picasso means images by the hundred that are continually on the move from subject to subject, idiom to idiom, echo to echo. Unlike the paintings, however, they show a minute precision and a steadiness of hand that are very remarkable for a man pushing 90. There is no way to fake or fudge with an etching needle and an

The preoccupations of late Picasso are manifold. Picasso in his 80s was reviewing some of the artists of the past - Rembrandt, above all -whom he loved most. He also looked back to certain themes, such as 'The Artist and His Model," that he had treated with sovereign distinction in the past,

Man's inhumanity to man obsessed him also, from the time of the Cuban missile crisis onward, as it had in the days of "Guernica." He developed what might be called a private repertory company of men and women whom he put through their paces howsoever he wished. Powered as always by a sexuality that seemed never to diminish, he portrayed lovers and loved ones with an ever-greater candor and directness. Nor did be shrink from the indignities that age had at last inflicted on him. and in his last self-portrait he saw a man on the very edge of the grave and looked him straight in the eye - too straight, in fact, for our

So there is a lot to look at, and a lot to think about, in late Picasso. "Late," in this context, means any time between 1963, when Picasso bad just turned 81, and 1973, when he had just turned 91. During those years, he was the most-famous artist in the world — quite possi-bly, the most-famous who ever lived — and be had dominated the international art scene for more than half a century.

Nor was it the domination of an absence. Picasso was not an artist who bad done ooe thing perfectly and thereafter lapsed into anomie. He had indeed made a colossal contribution in his 20s. Before 1914, in association with his friend and colleague Georges Braque, he had brought mankind the gift of Cubist painting, which is by general consent the greatest single achievement of the 20th century.

But he had worked hard almost every day of his long life. Year by year, be had reinvented himself, and in the 1960s he still had plenty of surprises in reserve, not only new work but older work that had never been seen before. There had to be, and in time there was, a point at which saturation took over. Picasso in art, as in life, had an overwhelm ing personality. Given the size of his output, the span of time that it covered and the amount of analysis that still remains to be done about it, it was inevitable that for all but the specialist the circuits of perception would become overloaded. There was just too much too take in, too many adjustments to be made, too many cross-references to be charted and checked.

There were historians who reeled at the thought of revising the canon yet once again, and there were younger artists for whom the lifework of Pablo Picasso was a labyrinth from which they emerged drained and diminished. Picasso by the time be was 75 had left an ineffaceable brand on the history of art, but it was a brand that castrated as often as not.

It was natural at that time that people should have looked with exhilaration and relief at paintings like Jasper Johns's wraithlike "Gray Numbers" (1958), Robert Rauschenberg's mix of painting and construction in the late 1950s, the black paintings made by Frank Stella around that time and the early chevron paintings of Kenneth Noland. Here at last was ground that Picasso had not trodden. American painters in particular had begun to think that they could get along perfectly well without looking over their shoulders at Picasso.

When the young American critic and historian Michael Fried wrote some 20 years ago, apropos of Stella, Noland and Morris Louis. that the best painting since World War II had been done in the United States, he spoke for a generation that was disposed to regard Picasso as a historical figure of altogether exceptional importance whose contribution had come to an end. It was to be 20 years before a not-yetmiddle-aged English painter, David Hockney, said in a public lecture that the best painting of the 1960s had been done not in the United States but in France, and by one man, Pablo

Il the signs were against Picasso in the late A 1960s, when Clement Greenberg, the foremost American critic of the day, felt able to write that the art of Picasso was no longer indispensable. But at virtually the same time, the Grand Palais and the Peut Palais acted as joint hosts to what was by any standard the largest exhibition of its kind ever to have been mounted in Paris.

Not only did it deal with Picasso's two-dimensional work in due depth, but it proved him to have been, in sculpture, as radical an innovator as be had been in painting. In fact, it would not be too much to say that as of that exhibition, the history of the 20th-century sculpture had to be rewritten. Even then, however, and even in Paris, the circuits of perception were overloaded. Picasso's close friend, the art historian Pierre Daix. believes that if there had been even the faintest sign of interest from the French authorities, Picasso would have allowed the sculptures in question to stay in Paris forever. But no such sign was forthcoming. Nor, later, was there any governmental move during his lifetime to sigalize the debt that Paris owed to Picasso.

Picasso bad been invaluable to Paris, both as a vitalizing force and as, beyond a doubt, the greatest of the many thousands or artists who had found Paris an ideal place in which to work. However, when Picasso turned into "late Picasso," the Parisian authorities had not even moved to prevent him, after a rent dispute, from being turned out of the studio on the Rue des Grands-Augustins in which he had lived ASSAU, the Bahamas - In an age of instant gratification, the time has now come for the manner com-in the sun. A Manhattan tour company came up with the idea. For $99 on Tuesdays and Wednesdays — $30 more the rest of the week - travelers are flown the 1.100 miles from Newark Airport to the Bahamas in two hours, dropped at the beach for four hours, rushed back to the airport, put on the plane and returned home by late evening. And they seem to love it. "I just had to feel some warmth on my bare back," says Karen Adams, a 32-year-old cashier at the Meadowlands race track in New Jersey. "A little warmth. A little sun. Even if it's only for the Flight 947 and a similar flight to the Bahamian resort town of Freeport are chartered by the tour company, Bahamas Express. Both flights depart every day and are filled mostly with people who plan to spend at least one night in the islands.

But the tour company hates to see a seat go empty. So it sells the extras to day-trippers who make reservations the day before they travel. "Better to send someone paying $99 than to send no one at all," says Bob Orfuss, the company's general manager.

Since the trips began in 1982, something like 1,500 passengers have taken off for a day in the Bahamas. There were 16 of them headed to Nassau, the nation's eapital, one recent

Some were self-styled adventurers. "A oneday trip to the Bahamas?" says Paula Lewis, 45, a Greenwich Village resident who has been known to take a weekend in London. "It's something to talk about the rest of your life." Others were gamblers wanting to spend a few hours in the island casinos. Most, though, were simply winter-beaten sun worshipers desperate to wissie their toes in hot sand. To get to the airport on time, Mark Scheidegger, 24, a warehouse worker from Kenilworth. New Jersey, set bis alarm for 5:30 A.M. He sat in a blue vinyl chair in the departure lounge his right hand resting on the small overnight bag that carried the essentials: two beach towels and a bathing suit. "If it's raining down there, it's going to be suicide for me," he says, looking as if be meant Scheidegger adds that he hates the final weeks of winter. "Spring may be coming," he explains, "but the weather up here has been so depressing for so long. I can't take any more gray weather."

He is traveling with a friend from work, Kevin Tierney, whose bope for the day, he says, is "to get rid of this alhino body." Scheidegger and Tierney want nothing more than to hake in the sun.

For others aboard the plane, there is a different goal. According to the tour operator, ro-

Shortly after 11 A.M., the jet skims across the azure waters off Nassau. Out the plane's windows, glistening white yachts can be seen shooting across the breakers.

When the passengers left Newark, the tem-perature was 36 degrees Fahrenheit (2 degrees centigrade), and a thin layer of dirt-streaked snow rested on the runway. Here it is 82 degrees. As the plane door opens, warm, moist air floods the cabin, bringing sighs of pleasure.

"It feels good to sweat again," Grob says.

After a quick bout with customs, the oneday tourists scramble to a bus for the 15minute trip to the beach. The bus sweeps past grand pastel-shaded Georgian homes. Along the road, clumps of red bougainvillea stand out in the lush, fragrant greenery. The honey scent of hibiscus is everywhere.

The bus pulls up in front of the Cable Beach Hotel, a resort a few minutes' walk from the city's center. Few of the travelers accept the hotel's offer of the free use of a room for the day. That, they say, would mean the loss of a few precious minutes in the sun. It is about noon. In four bours, the bus will pick them up for the return trip to the airport. The travelers synchronize their watches and run to the beach. "My skin just has to change color," one passenger says, stretching out on a beach chair. 'l don't care what color.'

Others on the beach sip cocount coolers and watch the waves numble in. Not everyone lazes on the sand. Unlike their fellow travelers, Panla Lewis and her companion, Henry Mullish, a professor of computer science at New York University, fear for their skin. "I fry," she says.

So they venture instead into Nassau, wandering along the narrow colonial streets. They mail a few postcards. One card goes to Rochester, a city of bitter winter cold in upstate New York. Lewis's niece

Susan lives there. The card reads: "Dear Susan, While you're slushing around in the snow, I wanted you to know I was wandering around in the Bahamas sun. Love, Paula."

That was it. € 1984 The New York Times

Elevator Going Up — In Decibels

MAHA. Nebraska — Tomorrow's elevators will offer more than transportation. There can be digital weather reports, stock prices and a female voice to greet passengers, announce the floors and tell what merchandise can be found there. "Welcome to Otis," the voice says, for example, as a passenger enters the car. "Please stand clear of the closing doors."

Stop at the second floor and the passenger hears: "Cocktail lounge, restaurant, casino." At another stop, the elevator announces. Sixth floor. Going up."

The Otis Elevator Co. is proud of its high-tech elevator, which it demonstrated bere. Overhead, a digital display can show weather reports, stock market quotations or advertisements, such as the daily special at the huilding's coffee shop.

The voice system has a 110-word vocabulary that can be prorammed to give almost any message to passengers, says Jack Illgner, Omaha manager for Otis. He explains that the voice is recorded and stored in memory chips in the elevator's control panel.

The messages can even deal with a prankster who, just before he gets off, decides to make the elevator stop at every floor.

"You're pressing too many huttons," the elevator says, canceling all the huttons pushed. "Please press only the huttons that are

The elevator also knows roughly how many people are on board because springs in the floor compute the passengers' weight. If the weight reaches the elevator's capacity, the voice says, "This elevator is full. Please take the next elevator.

If the machine stops between floors, it says, "Do not be alarmed, Please use the telephone to report the malfunction." The elevator also has batteries that allow it to operate for up to four hours in case of a nower failure. Some people who suffer from elaustrophobia may find that the elevator reassures them. "They feel like they're not alone," Illener The basic price of the elevator is $65,000 to $90,000, depending on the number of stops needed. The voice and digital display systems cost $5,000 each.

London's Hotels: Small Is Often Better

by Donald Goddard

ONDON — There seems bittle point in enduring the boredom of international air travel only to succumb to the monotony of international hotels more or less indistinguishable from their sister establishments in Syracuse and Milwaukee. That is why many visitors to London, in growing revolt against conveyor-belt vacations assembled by tour packages, are giving its small hotels their best season ever.

This is not to suggest, of course, that London's big hotels are all entirely lacking in character, although most of the newer ones are. Visitors who like, and can afford, the full traditional treatment will not be disappointed with Claridge's, for example, which continues to resist the trend toward the motel-anonymous school of hotelkeeping with superb dis-dain, refusing to accept inflation, staffing problems or declining expectations on the public's part as excuses for lowering standards. If Claridge's is full, there will be few complaints from those who fall back on the Berkeley (despite its air of luxurious boredom), the Ritz (despite disturbing hints of a "marketing policy"). Grosvenor House, the Savoy, the Dorchester or even the Hyde Park. But this is the easy way out - all it takes is money. For those prepared to take the trouble to seek them out, there are scores of smaller hotels in London aspiring to comparable standards of excellence on a less-grandiose scale. The only problem is how to choose one of character and individuality from the hundreds of places listed in the standard guidebooks. If a small hotel is taken to mean one of less than 100 rooms but offering all or most of the services expected of a larger establishment (or, if not, some compensating advantage), then the choice in London is wide enough for a theoretically perfect match between visitors who know what they like, however quirky, and an equally quirky hotelier who knows what they like - be it friendliness, comfort, personal attention, peace and quiet, charm, haute cuisine, refinement of decor, location, atmosphere or some combination of these, plus just plain caring about a guest's sense of well-being considerably to the pleasures of a visit to Small does not necessarily mean cheap, of course. No list would be complete without the Connaught but, as the old joke goes, if you have to ask how much it costs, you cannot afford to stay at the Connaught. The hotel is so beset by would-be patrons hungering for a bed with status that its management actually pleads with the media not to mention it. Luxurious in a restrained, English manner, and blessed with a notable restaurant, the Connaught is a haven for the privileged few, but some of its 90 rooms are on the poky side, and as excess demand is not always a spur to impeccable service, those turned away may find an alternative at the

Stafford Hotel in St. James's Place. The Stafford's location is, if anything, better than the Connaught's, and its restaurant and cellar at least as good and in the same classic

Restaurants: Light Makes Right

by Patricia Wells

AINT-PERE-SOUS-VEZELAY, France — As one would expect after 10-plus years of unrelieved nouvelle cuisine. grand French cooking is going through another transorma-tion. What it will be called no one knows, although "cuisine moderne" has for several years become the password for those who don't want to touch the term nouvelle cuisine. What it is, is a grown-up, more-sophisticated, stripped-down cuisine. We see it, in a more complex form, at Paris's Jamin, and in a simplified version at Marc and Françoise Meneau's l'Espérance, at the foot of this hillside village in northern Burgundy. It's no coincidence that Meneau and Joël Robuchon of Jamin are France's newest

Michelin three-star chefs. They both cook, as they are fond of saying, for the way we live today, rejecting beavy, outdated menus in favor of lightness and simplicity, rejecting overburdened, baroque dining rooms for those that are equally elegant and sophisticated but less distracting. "Of course everyone still dreams of those wonderful regional dishes, like coq cu vin, because this is food that's psychologically reassuring, food that makes us feel as though traditions are being preserved. But in reality, this is not the kind of food people want to eat loday," Meneau insists. "People are happy with the first hite, but then they're frustrated afterward. The food is just too heavy."

Of course, be is speaking not of histro fare, not of home cooking, but of the kind of cuisine one expects to find in an establishment such as his.

"If I made boudin, oo one would order it here. I had tête de venu on the menu, but no one ordered it, so I took it off. I would love to offer just a simple roast leg of lamb. But my clients - one third of whom are Parisian, one third of whom are foreigners - don't want to eat that kind of food here," be explains.

As Meneau worked to improve his cuisine, moving from two Michelin stars to three, be intentionally moved toward simplification and refinement. Like an artist or painter who tries to communicate with as few brush strokes as possible, he worked to reduce to a minimum the number of products on a single plate. What one will find in this bright, plant- and flower-filled greenhouse of a restaurant is a cuisine that is highly personal — such dishes as green olives stuffed with truffle puree, then showered with jet-black julienned truffles. It's Meneau's attempt to wake up palates, to add a burst of humor to food, combining common, lowly olives with the noble truffle. And it works: the disb seems bizarre, and you take the first bite with a bit of skepticism. Then you take another and another. Soon you're a believer, and a totally satisfied

Or take his warm, sautéed duck foie gras set atop a coarse, full-flavored crèpe de mais, a com-based pancake. This is one of his intellectual dishes, purposefully combining the food that nourishes the animal with the animal itself. For the same reason, he marries a cold terrine of foic gras with a fresh fig compote, since in the olden days, ducks were fattened on figs, not just corn. But of course you don't have to go to Vezelay to intellectualize. Go there to eat, 10 feast, to be parapered. A recent Saturday night dinner there was close to flawless. Françoise Meneau oversees the dining room with a professional air, but she, as well as the rest of the staff, seems to be having a very good time at it,

The menu, which changes from season to season, offers an appealing variety of dishes, currently including milk-fed spring lamb that has real flavor, and a simple, sublime roast pigeon that speaks of quality and care. The wine list is exceptionally well-notated, carefully listing shippers or individual winemakers, representing every ajor region of France. On the extensive cheese tray, you'll find a rare regional treat, Epoisses — this one from the fine Berthaut Laiterie in the village of Epoisses — that's been aged and aged to a buttery, pungent richness. Proper aging turns this normally firm cheese with a slightly pronounced flavor into one that resembles a perfect vacheria, so smooth and creamy it can be eaten with n spoon. Here the Epoisses is rich and rare, and it goes perfectly with Meneau's five-grain bread, baked on the premises for each service.

But the streamlining ends at the dessert course; overkill is the only word to use. And Meneau manages to succeed where few others do: quality is not automatically lost to quantity. He loves petit fours, so you find fresh and almondy madeleines along with perhaps half a dozen other fresh-from-the-oven sweets, designed to fill the few empty moments while you wait for the rolling dessert cart, usually full of several rich chocolate desserts.

With dessert, another of Meneau's personal favorites arrives, also an unexpected extra: it's a rich, chocolatey ganache, served still warm from the kitchen. On top of this there are several fine warm desserts to be ordered at the beginning of the meal, including a blend of roast figs and pears served with cinnamon ice cream.

After lunch or dinner retire for coffee, in front of the fire in cooler months, to the terrace in warmer months. Later, wander through the old village of Saint-Père-Sous-Vezelay. Tomorrow there will be enough time to search out boudin, tête de venu and coq au vin dishes, that, no matter what anyone says, will never go out of style in L'Espérance, 89450 Saint-Père-Sous-Vézelay: tel: (86) 33.20.45. Credit cards: American Express and Visa. Closed early January to early February, and Tuesday and Wednesday lunch. Menus at 230 and 300 francs (about $28 and $37), not including wine and service. A la carte, from 250 to 550 francs, including wine and service.

In the Swedish Kingdom of Glass

by Mimi Mann

OSTA, Sweden — In 16th-century Sweden, in the moated medieval fortress of Kalmar, King Gustavus Vasa took time from wars with neighbors to the east and south to console himself with parties at court. So many expensive Venetian and Bohemian glasses were smashed by the merrymakers, according to legend, that Vasa decided to save money for the battles ahead by cutting down on his glassware budget and inviting a Venetian glassblower to the Swedish court. The first glassware was made in Sweden in 1556, and in the centuries to come nearly 200 glassworks (glasbruken in Swedish) appeared, of which about 20 remain. The kingdom of glass, as the Swedes call it, is in the province of Smaland, a rugged region scooped by Ice Age glaciers and abounding io glittering lakes and the dense forests that have provided the wood for the glassworks' fur-

In the 18th century, Anders Koskull and Georg Bogislaus Stael voo Holstein, lords lieutenant and life guards to King Carl XII of Sweden, were given posts as provincial governors in Smaland, one to rule from Kalmar and the other from Vaxjo, once an Iron Age and Viking trade center. They decided to establish a crystal factory, and they found their site midway between the Iwo towns. Sweden's oldest glass factory was founded there in 1742 at what came to be called Kosta, after the first letters of the names of its founders, Koskull and Stael.

Expert glassblowers were brought in from Bohemia. For about a century, window glass accounted for 70 percent of total sales. Another glassworks was founded in 1864 at neighboring Boda by two glassmakers who began their careers at Kosta. It, too, dealt mainly in window glass and jugs, but eventually turned to tableware.

By 1890 Kosta had improved the technology of glass production. In 1970, Kosta, Boda and Afors glassworks were merged, and in 1972, with the acquisition of the Johansfors glass-works, the company changed its name to Kosta

Boda AB. Although the first glassblowers, migrant workers from Bohemia, seldom stayed very long in one glassworks, a few settled down. Their descendants still live in many of the colorfully paioted cottages that line the narrow roads leading to the plants.

The art of glassblowing has changed little. A oew continuous melting furnace for the production of crystal has made it possible to turn out glass of a previously unattainable quality, but any piece of crystal is still the glory of the designer and the team of master craftsmen who sculpt it into reality.

Connoisseurs say that a piece of crystal should never be perfect, that there must be slight defects to reveal that the glassware has been crafted by human hands. The size and number of faults will determine the category of the piece. First-quality, signed pieces and limited editions bring the highest prices. Seconds, flawed but judged worthy of carrying the oame of the glassworks, reach the shelves of the many outlets in the area. Anything less is discarded. "People talk about this being a plastic world, bul customers by the thousands flock to Kosta Boda for quality," says the company's director, Anders Engstrom. "We have the same craftsmanship and traditious we bad in 1742, but we use modern technology to melt the glass. Here we use full lead crystal, 30 percent, the highest in the industry. Our three main markets -West Germany, the United States and Greece

- demand different products, bringing about diversity and many separate lines of items."

At Kosta Boda's main factory outlet in Kosta, visitors can buy the glass at a discount as much as 40 percent off department-store prices. The outlet offers a full range of tradiand glass circus animals to Kosta's best-selling tional items, from stemware to signed vases item, the "Snowball," a crystal candle holder, of which more than 500,000 have been sold. Boda's factory outlet shows more unconventional lines, light-hearted creations in colored glass. At Orrefors, purchasers can choose from stemware, decanters and hand-painted flow-

The factory in the village of Johansfors of-fers substantial savings on stemware, while Afors features the artist collection of colored items. Io the village of Sea, the factory displays barware and lopsided fantasies in vases and carafes. Nybro specializes in Christmas decorations and animal scenes encased in glass. Skruf shows enched pieces, and Emmaboda crystal miniatures. Bergdala specializes in names engraved oo glass. At Sandvik, Orrefors tableware can be purchased, and at Strombergshyttan visitors are given the opportunity to master the difficult

was the attitude of the citizens of Basel, Switzerland, who voted by referendum to buy two late paintings by Picasso for which lunds would not otherwise bave been available. It also fell to the great museum in Basel to organize in the fall of 1981 an exhibition of real substance on the subject of "Picasso: The Late Work 1964-1972,"

Any exhibition of the late works of Picasso poses problems of selection. Even by Picasso's own standards, his output during the years in question was enormous.

Not for one moment was it in his mind to retire. Between March and October 1968, be made 347 etchings. Between December 1969 and January 1971, he made 194 drawings. Between the beginning of 1970 and March 1972, he made a further 156 engravings. In the summer of 1970, and again in the summer of 1973, be was easily able to full the huge spaces of the Palace of the Popes in Avignon with late paintings.

None of these were perfunctory productions, although there were necessarily some ups and downs in their quality. When the time came to go through his estate and choose what should be allocated to the Picasso Museum in Paris, for which no opening date has been vouchsafed, and what should be distributed among his heirs, it was found that the figures given above were anything but exhaustive. For the Guggenheim show, Gert Schiff the many-sided art historian who selected the works - has opied for a thematic treatment (like his colleagues in Basel in 1981), starting from the evening in October 1962 on which Picasso and two of his friends projected slides of famous paintings of massacres by Nicolas Poussin and Jacques-Louis David. In no time at all, as it would have seemed to any other painter, Picasso produced his own "Rape of the Sabines," a painting 76 inches (190 centimeters) high and 51 inches wide that is now in the Boston Museum of Fine Arts. Dealing with a subject that shows no signs of going out of style, it sets before us in close-up the arbitrariness of war. Men savage their fellow men with sword and lance. Women and their children are trampled underfoot by horses maddened beyond endurance. On a rich and rolling pastoral landscape, the sun shines. A Greek temple, with its overtones of order and harmony, stands high above the melee. Picasso never to our knowledge witnessed a shot fired in anger or a killer's knife drawn from its sheath, but on this occasion, the amplitude and cogency of the design, the sumptuous corporeality of the tormented figures and the blind frenzy of the horses combine to make an overwhelming impression. (By comparison, "Guernica" is evasive.) All war, declared or undeclared, civil or sanctified, is somewhere in this painting.

In the context of the Guggenheim show, this painting remains exceptional, bowever. Late Picasso, as we see it in New York, bas primarily to do with private concerns. There is the question - often treated by Picasso's friend and arch-rival Matisse - of what precisely happens when the paioter at work on the painting is himself its principal subject. This can never be anything other than an alarming confrontation. The painter is there as judge, but he is on trial as much as the sitter.

sion of irony, ambiguity and quite possibly of passion is added. Traditionally, the painter has the upper hand, since it is, after all, his account of the scene that will go down to posterity. But what if the sitter gets the upper hand, and the painter feels himself tantalized and found wanting? Fancy dress will not help him, for whether dressed or not be feels himself naked before the sitter's gaze. This is the situation that late Picasso explores in so many ways, like a diarist who has too much to get down on paper and all must be said before time runs out. Schilf, in his catalog, is very good indeed on paintings like the "Seated Musketeer." Picasso loved to dress up, and he undoubtedly detected the relish with which Rembrandt put on his very best clothes when he painted himself with his young wife in 1636 or thereabouts. Painting

a comparable figure in February 1969, Picasso set about it with colossal panache. The velvet hat with its superabundant feathers, the puffed and ruffled sleeves, the flamboyant high heeled boots - they all had their turn.

Picasso also added two inventions of his own. One was the long Dutch pipe that often figures in his late work. The other was the little Cupid, love's messenger and go-between, who cuts so perky a figure in a corner of the canvas. Rembrandt never painted such a pipe, and I for one incline to go along with Gert Schiff when he traces the repeated appearance of the long, thin clay pipe to the emblematic tradition according to which the soon-to-vanish pipe smoke symbolizes the fleeting character of

As for the figure of Cupid, which Schiff believes to have evolved out of the small sons with whom proud fathers have always liked to be painted, be is everywhere in late Picasso. Sometimes he turns up as umpire, motivator and henchman. Sometimes be is invisible, but we know that the scene set before us owes much to his conniving. For let it be clearly stated: Late Picasso is about sexuality as much as it is about anything. Whether in the buge, chunky, clumsy-seeming naked bodies in the paintings, or in the uproar-ious anatomical turnult of the engravings, sex is everywhere and (as it often seems) everything.

In the late etchings, we sense that he tried on occasion to get the whole world into a single place, just as Rembrandt aimed to do with his "Hundred Guilder Print." He never gave up, never cut corners, never said, "That'll do for

Even wheo he had made the last self-portrait that is reproduced here, he did not shrink from the evidence of his imminent death, but went back (according to his friend Daix) and added the crayon lines, somewhere between mauve and garnet-red in color, that give the image a look of definitive disquiet. He had made a death's head in bronze nearly 30 years earlier, but this one was for real, and it was his own, and it was not in his nature to shirk it. @ 1984 The New York Times

totel exudes an Edwardian serenity, with one if the prettiest lounges in London for after-noon tea, and 65 bedrooms or suites, all different, and furnished in unaggressive good taste.

Failing the Stafford, not 50 yards away, in a as-lit courtyard off St. James's Place, is Dukes lotel, built to provide a London address for he younger sons of the nobility, and a hotel ince 1908. Declining gently over the years, Dukes was bought in 1976 by a former guest in he oil business, who appears since then to have applied the revenues from at least one well to loing the place up.

Aiming for opulence rather than flash in the I bedrooms and 14 suites, he has even re-placed the plastic toilet seats with warmer vooden ones. But when the management demoved on the second floor by omitting to replace the old the previously affixed to the loors, the regulars responded as though they ad been offered a bed without sheets.

Tradition can be a powerful factor in the totel business, as three generations of Gorings vill testify. The Goring Hotel, situated beween Buckingham Palace and Victoria Staion, was built in 1910 by the grandfather of he present resident director, George Goring, who still makes a point of sleeping in every one it its 100 rooms and suites (when unoccupied, a course) to make sure "they are as comfortble as they look."

In this, the first hotel in the world, so it is laimed, to provide steam heat and a private path with every room, shoes left outside the loor will not only still be there in the morning out brilliantly polished as well. It has a genersity of space now rare, and a ratio of staff to pedrooms three times the national average.

For many people, location is not a critical actor, as two of the most fashionable hotels in he city have proved. The Portobello, near the ntiques market in Notting Hill, and Blakes, suried in probably the ugliest street of South Censington, are both remembered in the prayas of taxi drivers because guests can go nowhere without them, and yet each has a devotad international clientele. Launched at the tart of the 1970s from the common ground of 10 previous experience in the hotel business, a lesire to cater to a self-indulgent generation without pomp or mock humility; and a pasionate interest in interior decoration, the two notels have since moved in opposite directions without changing course.

Blakes, masierminded by the former actress . Anouska Hempel, has grown bigger, lusher and more exotic in decor, encouraging (and incouraged by) the patronage of the movie and media crowd, plus a touch of the rag trade, while the Portobello, managed by Eva Lofstad, has shrunk from 32 rooms to 25 (to provide more space and comfort for fewer spests), is steadily replacing its modern furniture with antiques, and is much favored by working celebrities who want to be left alone. Blakes is a full-service hotel, with an almost paralyzingly smart restaurant sometimes pa-tronized by royalty; the Portobello, still staffed as a matter of policy by local people with no previous experience — to avoid "bad habits" picked up in lesser hotels — is run like a private house, without porters or room service, but with a reception desk as efficient as any in London, and a bar-restaurant that serves good, simple, inventive meals 24 hours a day.

For some, the decor at Blakes may seem selfconscious and studied, perhaps lacking in humor. For others, the decor at the Portobello may seem low-key and casual, if occasionally bizarre - its Round Room, for example, features o canopied, circular bed in a round bay window overlooking Stanley Gardens, and a Mighty Wurlitzer of a bathtub and shower with enough exposed piping and brass faucets to please a ship's engineer. But for those too tired, or too uninterested, to keep up with the latest trends in decorative thought, the answer may well be Number 16.

Unimpressed with London's small hotels as they were then, Michael Watson left the brewery trade in 1970 to show the world how they should be run, at .16 Sumner Place, South Kensington. Since then, he has spread into Numbers 15 and 17 as well, and oow has 25 rooms at competitive rates in this elegant terrace of early Victorian townhouses.

Number 16 is for those who prefer to eat out, for there is no restaurant; who are fit enough to cope with stairs to the upper floors, for there is no elevator; who can be trusted to help themselves at the bar, for there is no barman (guests are asked to sign chits for their drinks); and who generally value fresh flowers, fine furni-ture and quiet domestic efficiency.

Equally unhotel-like is the oewly opened L'Hotel at 28 Basil Street, just by Harrods. Frenchified by Margaret and David Levin, who own the Capital Hotel a few doors up the street, its 12 rooms have been furnished in pine and country-style fabrics, with touches of brass and Art Nouveau, notably in the working firecounts the Metro, a trendy oew wine bar in the basement, bot the Capital offers — at a price — some of the best French food to be had in

An Olympic Guide to Los Angeles

Some Beds Are Still Available

by John Brannon Albright

OS ANGELES - Finding a place to stay in Los Angeles during the Olympics this summer may not be the horrendous problem that some travelers expect. It will not be as simple as making a ingle telephone call and getting anything you vant, but with a little patience, perseverance and, more than anything else, planning, there should be no reason to go roofless.

What has caused most people to be skepocal of their chances is that the nrganizers have booked about 80 percent of the rooms in the najor hotels for participants, officials of participating countries and their entourages. Dur-ing the 16 days between July 28 and Aog. 12, when the 23d Olympiad takes place, about 650,000 visitors are expected in Southern California. Many will have tickets in Olympic events, but they will not know which events they will be seeing or on which days until tickets are mailed in June. By that time most housing is likely to be filled, so prospective spectators should begin oow to make inquiries. A sampling of places to contact follows.

One place, however, that is not offering to help is the Greater Los Angeles Olympic Com-mittee. Calls to the committee are referred to the Greater Los Angeles Visitors and Conven-tion Bureau, which in turn emphasizes that neither it nor any other single organization is acting as an overall clearinghouse. The visitors' bureau will however, send you a list of hotels. motels, bed-and-breakfast organizations, house-rental referral agencies, hostels and campgrounds.

Whether you write or call the bureau, be sure to specify that you want the "accommodations list." If you fail to specify, you might receive the "broker's list" for people wanting to rent ont their homes. Also, unless you send a selfaddressed, stamped envelope with first-class postage — a single 20-cent stamp should suffice — the list will be mailed bulk rate.

What are your chances of finding a regular hotel room? A recent random search yielded these results. Figueroa Hotel (near the Los Angeles Coliseum): "Least expensive rooms are gone; you can expect to pay $120 a night plus tax. Payment in advance required." Los Angeles Hilton: "Our downtown hotel is fully honked. We expect to have rooms available at the Hilton Anaheim Tower (oow under construction) at $130 a night with a seven-day minimum stay."

Unless you don't mind running up a steep telephone bill, you will probably be better off dealing with one of the private concerns that are acting as clearinghouses of a sort, such as Specific Holidays, originalty a tour operator. It is offering a wide variety of accommodations, ranging from campsites and college dormitories to estates and yachts. The rates also cover a wide spectrum: $20 a day for two people in their own tent to $7,353 a day for six people aboard a chartered yacbt.

Some other typical rates: $25 a day for a site for two to park their own recreational vehicle; $90 a night for two in a bedroom with bath in a private house without meals or kitchen privi eges; $90 a night for two in a room with kitchen in a college dormitory; $107 a night for two with breakfast in a private house; $115 to $196 a night for two in a motel; $129 in $250 a night for two in a hotel; $168 a day for two in a one-bedroom house, apartment or coodinmini-um with use of kitchen, washer/dryer, pool and possibly recreation room; $336 a day for eight people in a four-bedroom house, poss also — at an extra charge — use of the home-owner's automobile; $1,000 to $1,882 a day for an estate, some with security guards; $1,470 to $7,353 a day for a yacht (most of them sleeping

In the case of bouses, apartments, condominiums, estates and yachts, a minimum stay is required, ranging from 10 to 17 days. (The most expensive yacht — with captain and capable of holding 70 guests at a cocktail party — rents at a minimum of $125,000.)

Among others handling house rentals is 1984 Los Angeles Housing, Average rate: $60 a person a day in private houses ranging from two to five bedrooms; 14-day minimum stay. Total minimum cost: from $3,400 in $10,000. As an added inducement, the organization is setting up a ticket-exchange program, using o computer to match its clients who want to dispose of Olympie tickets with others wanting to acquire them.

Many real estate brokers, among them Century 21 and Merrill Lynch Realty, are also acting as rental referral agencies. Among college complexes offering dormitory housing, two — the Claremont Colleges and Biola — are represented by Astra Tours and Travel. The rate is $35 a person a night in double or single rooms, many with private bath; seven-night minimum stay. A brochure and application blank may be obtained by sending a self-addressed, stamped envelope to the address listed below. For tent and recreational vehicle campers.

one prominent clearinghouse is Leisuretime Reservation Systems. Rates range from $15 to $30 a night for two, plus a booking fee of $5. These sites may be reserved by mail or with MasterCard or Visa by calling a toll-free oum-

ber. To obtain a list of campsites, request "Camping Guide '84" and send $1 for postage and handling.

Three facilities affiliated with Kampgrounds of America are also within range of the 20 or so Olympic sites (which stretch along the coast from Santa Barbara to San Diego and as far inland as San Bernardino County). Their rates range from $14.75 for two ot a tent site to $27.50 for twn at an Recreation Vehicle site.

Full payment in advance or deposit required. Among at least 19 bed-and-breakfast organizations is California Housequests International. Rates: from $70 in $120 a night for two in a room with breakfast; from $150 to $1,000 a night for full houses, apartments or condominiums. Minimum stay: seven nights.

A word of caution: Many organizations use telephone-answering machines, which some-times malfunction. Call when phone rates are lowest. If you get a broken machine, you'll not have wasted much money, and if there is no answer, it is likely that when you call during business hours you will reach a person rather than a machine

The Natives Are Restless

by Nancy Mills

OS ANGELES - There are signs that life here is getting stranger now that the Summer Olympics are approaching, but most people haven't noticed. The secret, apparently, is to be so caught up in one's own preoccupations that oothing else penetrates — this could explain how a city can lourish in an earthquake zone,

Nothing is sacred, not even the gynecologist's office. Women do not normally expect to be entertained when they're having a check-up. However, a few doctors have redecorated their examining rooms to feature on the ceiling posters of such personalities as Paul Newman and Tom Selleck. (At this point, the Selleck room is more in demand.)

Not that Southern Californians have trouble meeting movie stars, or at least reasonable facsimiles. For very little money a Robert Redford sound-alike will record the message on your telephone answering machine. That really impresses certain people, as does a gift from Burt Reynolds's mail-order catalog. A bit closer to the real thing is a visit to John Travolta's new exercise club or one of Jane Fonda's workout studios. It's not guaranteed that Travolta or Fonda will appear, but there are enough people there who look like them, so that's all right Of course, there are those who don't believe

III exercise.

They sleep late every morning, if they can tune out the pounding heels of joggers who get a 5 A.M. start. Although half the day's business is likely to be transacted over breakfast, not everyone functions successfully before dawn. Thousands of East Coasters who have been transferred here don't make it to their offices until 10 A.M. These are the people who have not yet commissioned a portrait of their swim-

Subtlety is not a highly prized quality bere. Take, for example, the chubby, balding man who often stands outside a Los Angeles movie house wearing a sandwich board. On the board is a large picture of himself, his telephone oumber and a caption: "What do you think of my face?" As he hands out leaflets, he explains earnestly that he is looking for a wife. When the lights grow dark in the theoter, there be is again, this time on the screen. For two minutes the audience gets to watch a picture of his pink, eager face and phone oumber. At last report, he is still single.

Most people aren't quite that out-front about meeting others. Instead, they join groups like the Millionaires Club for Singles. According to the membership chairman, the oame was chosen "because it is bold and attracts people who are bright, progressive and upwardly mo-bile." There's no menoon of actually needing a million dollars to join; how selective can they be when whole neighborhoods are receiving applications through the mail?

f Southern Californians are lucky enough to find that special someone, they can contemplate how to have the ultimate upscale wedding. One option is hiring a "fiddler on the roof" to entertain guests. That's very effective, unless it's raining. Or, they can rent a dozen doves and have them released during an appropriate moment in the ceremony.

Afterward, the lucky couple can take one of Eddie's Exotic Limos to the airport. Eddie's "super 32-foot stretch jacuzzi limo" has a bartender, plush velours and mink interior, hot tub and rumble seat. Perhaps it would be available for the whole honeymoon. What's the most awesome wedding present a local couple can receive? Opinions vary. Some parents recommend a stress relief kit, which contains an instruction book, tape and "left/ right brain pillow." Many ocwlyweds seem to prefer an Aroma Disk Player - the latest

This device works like a record player but instead of music, you switch on "Movie Time" and get the smell of hot buttered popcorn. For depressing occasions you can switch on "The Party's Over" for the scent of beer and stale cigarette smoke. No, that's wrong. This was a lite-wine party, so the odor disk emits the smell of coffee brewing.

Left at the altar? Call Rigor Mortis Florist and have them deliver one of their specialties: Morticia's Madness — o bouquet of decapitated roses; Aunt Hagatha's Folly — a variety of dead blossoms; or Uriah's Heep - a dozen deceased carnations.

Those oot planning ouptials this year needn't despair. New Orleans Rushing to the Fair Orleans World's Fair is in what one executive calls the "duck mode" smooth and unruffled on the surface, paddling like crazy underneath.

Out there in the mud, in what used to be a warehouse district beside the Mississippi River in the middle of town, the site of the fair still looks like a war zone. But the shape of this $350-million exposition is beginning to show For two months, problems with cash flow

Investors Using Computers To Reach Discount Brokers

By DAVID E. SANGER

New York Times Service Then Sam Liberto travels, his broker usually tags along -tucked under Mr. Liberto's arm.

Mr. Liberto's broker is his Apple computer. With a few keystrokes, Mr. Liberto can instruct the machine to dial a telephone number, hook into a larger computer system in Palo Alto, California, and retrieve the day's closing prices on stocks in his portfolio. With a few more strokes, an electronic order form appears on his screen, and in seconds he can pass along an electronic message to his discount brokerage in San Francisco, instructing it to buy or sell.

It's just the beginning,' says a discount broker. But progress costs.

"In a way, it's easier to do this by computer than over the telephone," Mr. Liberto said. He can review his portfolio at leisure, and he rarely feels the pressure that confronts many who deal with discount brokers by phone — to rush an order along so that the telephone clerk can take the next call.

Mr. Liberto is definitely in the minority. At best, only a few thousand personal computer users communicate with their bro-kers electronically — although thousands more use their machines to analyze stock performance on electronic spreadsheets such as Visicale and Louis 1-2-3. But many brokerage houses, mostly discounters, think that people willing to tinker with stock analysis are also willing to trade—and they are rushing to make the technology available.

Many experts say that by the end of the year most major discount brokers will offer home-computer services. If legal hurdles can be surmounted, they may even do so in cooperation with banks, which are looking into computerized systems as a means of getting their discount brokerage services off the ground. Max Ule thinks the new technology is not that complicated.

Mr. Ule, who runs a small discount brokerage in New York, is in the advance guard of trade-at-home computing. Two years ago he took three Radio Shack Model I computers — one of the earliest personal computers, long since discontinued — and set up a telephone "bulletin board." He called it Tickerscreen.

Mr. Ule says that several hundred customers, each with his or her own password, use the computerized trading service. They can place an order any time between 7 P.M. and 9 A.M. The instruction is saved on a floppy disk in the Radio Shack ma-chines, and Mr. Ule's staff acts on the instructions when the market opens the next morning.

Mr. Ule's clients are enthusiastic. Greg Dougherty, a videotape editor, trades through the system from his apartment. He said he had "never had a single technical problem." Best of all, Mr. Ule's service is free — clients pay only the commission they would ordinatily be charged.

Now technology may have passed Mr. Ule by. A far more sophisticated system, rum by Trade Plus Inc. of Palo Alto, California, has been embraced by two larger brokerage houses, C. D. Anderson & Co. and Fidelity Brokerage Services, the trading arm of Fidelity Investments in Boston. Through the Trade Plus system, an investor can, for example, maintain up to three separate portfolios, research stock histories and keep tax records on trading. Transfers can also be made to individual retirement accounts and Keogh accounts.

T t's just the beginning," said William A. Porter, the president of Trade Plus, "Soon we plus to be adding long term historical data, a financial news service and information about individual companies." Already an investor can designate high and low trading price limits for each stock in his or her portfolio, and the computer will sound an alarm if one of the boundaries is crossed.

But progress comes at a price. Fidelity and C. D. Anderson needed for the home computer to dial up the bigger system. During business hours, Trade Plus charges $24 an hour for connection time to its host computer, at night, the fee drops to $6 an hour. Trade Plus estimates that, because most users can get the information they need in a few minutes, the average user's bill totals $15 a month; on top of that, of course, are commissions.

Critics of such systems contend that they are no bargain for the computer user. By entering the order electronically, the client is doing most of a discount broker's job for him.

But Robert L. Gould, the president of Fidelity Brokerage Services, which has about 260,000 clients, points to the variety of informational services that Fidelity will offer, which he said "really make this a bargain.".

And, he argues, the systems can fill a psychic void for computer users, many of whom may be trying to justify the purchase of a computer to their spouses.

Mexican Men Join Women's Preserve

By Richard J. Meislin New York Times Service

CTUDAD JUAREZ, Mexico - After years of being a nearly all-female preserve, Mexico's border assembly plants have begun to employ men.

The move will not only meet a steadily rising demand for labor, according to officials and businessmen here, but might also repair the social damage done by putting nearly all the available women into the work force while leaving many men unemployed.
"We had become a matriarchy," said Arnulfo Castro Munive, president of the Association of Maquiladoras, the Mexican name for the border assembly plants. "It had ruptured the social equilibrium."

The maquiladora industry was established in 1966 to bring development to Mexico's northern border.

Manufacturers are allowed to import parts without normal duties or restrictions for assembly as long as the assembled products do not remain in Mexico. Under U.S. law, the companies pay duties on the return trip only on the value added in the assembly process. Thus many companies produce parts in a factory on the American side of the border, ship them to their plants in Mexico for assem-bly, and then ship them back. Employment in the assembly industry in this city soared by 19 percent last year, to 63,000, largely because the steady devalua-tion of the Mexican peso has made labor costs increasingly attractive to U.S. business. A Mexican assembly line worker now earns the equivalent of $28 for a 45-hour work-

Border-wide, the growth was about 11 per-cent in 1983. Some 140,000 people were em-ployed in assembly at the end of the year. producing about $900 million worth of goods. More than half consisted of electrical and electronics products, according to Mexico's central bank and the Ministry of Planning and Budget.

But as the industry grew, labor shortages developed and "the women began to take advantage of the situation," Mr. Castro said. "If they didn't like what they were doing, they would just quit because they knew they could find work someplace else."

Mr. Castro said that by the end of last year, nearly one in three workers at the assembly plants were men. The goal is to raise the proportion of male workers to 60 percent by the end of the decade.

Word of the change has been slow to get out, and many men are hesitant to seek employment in an area now established as "women's work."

One unemployed man in his mid-30's, making a few hundred pesos a day by shutting illegal immigrants across the Rio Grande on his back, said he had not tried the plants because "the maquiladoras are only for the women." As Mayor Barrio put it: "Many people haven't even realized that many of the maquiladoras admit men."

Only about 10 percent of the maquiladora workers in Juárez are unionized, far below the national average. "If you don't feel the need, you're not going to unionize," Mr.

Mr. Van Waas's study found that payoffs to union officials and a few well-publicized shutdowns in the wake of strikes also helped to diminish union activity.

Thus far, the maquiladora industry's benefit to Mexico has been almost solely in providing employment. Few Mexican products are used in the assembly lines, according to the Banco Nacional de Mexico, partly because of manufacturers' "restrictive practices" and partly because of "poor quality, insufficient supply and deficient deliveries, as well as lack of interest on the part of local manufacturers."

So while several border plants assemble high-quality, moderately priced televisions, for example, a similar product remains dear and often shoddy in the Mexican market.

U.S. Trade Gap At $10.1 Billion, Another Record

Compiled by Our Staff From Dispatches
WASHINGTON — The U.S. merchandise trade deficit expand-ed in February to a record $10.1 billion from January's $9.5 billion, also a record, the Commerce Department said Thursday. The value of exports fell 6.1 per-cent, to $17.2 billion, while imports were $27.3 billion — the secondhighest import total on record, although down 1.8 percent from Jan-

Even the most pessimistic fore-casts see the U.S. trade deficit topping $100 billion by the end of this year. If the deficit continued at the February level for the rest of the year, the 1984 total would be $120 billion. The 1983 trade deficit was a record $69.4 billion. As the trade deficit widens, hurting export-related industries and taking the edge off economic growth, pressure is growing in Congress for measures to cut the numper of imports.

The merchandise trade deficit with Japan alone was $2.4 billion in February after $2.6 billion in Janu-

The total deficit widened despite a 1.2-percent decline in the cost of imported oil for the month, to $4.7 billion. Although crude oil cost an average of 3 cents a barrel more in February, at $28.71, the prices of residual fuel oil, propane and butane dropped.

Reagan administration officials have urged Congress not to overreact to the rapid growth of the trade deficit and to resist pressure for ing discussions with U.S. banks, must classify as problem loans the Argentine government, the Innew import barriers on steel, tex-tiles and other products.

China Agrees With the EC on Textile Quotas

The Associated Press BELIING - China agreed Thursday to new quotas on its textile exports to the 10-nation

A protocol, requiring the approval of the European Commission in Brussels, was initialed by the chief EC negotiator, Jean-Pierre Leng, and Li Dengshan, head of the Chinese delegation, after five rounds of negotiations.

The agreement renews a fiveyear pact that expired in 1983. The new quotas were not dis-closed, but China had sought an average 20-percent increase in quotas for different categories of clothing and textiles, while the EC wanted an average 6 to 7 percent.

In January, the EC unilaterally raised quotas by as much as percent. China exported $360 million of textiles to EC countries in the first half of 1983, nearly double the 1982 rate, causing concern to EC manu-

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF COTTON MATHER

By Kenneth Silverman. Illustrated. 479 pp.

Harper & Row, 10 East 53d St., New York, N.Y. 10022.

Reviewed by Anatole Broyard

M OST people think of Cotton Mather as a thundering bigot who encouraged the Salem witch trials at the end of the 17th century. Even a venerable historian like Vernon Parrington accused Mather of having "a crooked and diseased mind." The poet Robert Lowell described him as "twisted with subtle-ty," adding that "his soft bookish hands are indelibly stained with blood."

In "The Life and Times of Cotton Mather." Kenneth Silverman shows us how grossly oversimplified such statements are. A professor of English at New York University, Silverman has almost literally moved heaven and earth to do justice to the most learned minister and prolific writer of the early American church. He appears to have read all 388 of Mather's published works, which range from church history to a summary of 17th-century medical practice.

An immense richness is what one feels first of all in reading "The Life and Times of Cotton Mather." Silverman has got bold of one of the most colorful men in American history and he treats Mather with all the awe, sympathy and skepticism that he deserves. Whether right or wrong, Mather was always interesting, as great men are. And since he was the most active busybody that America ever produced, Mather's life story reaches into every part of his

Descended from a family of famous ministers. Cotton Mather had literary ambitions that led him to see preaching as an art. He wrote that he wished to use "my Wit. as well as my Grace" to give his devotions "a certain charming Elegancy, and Sacred Curiousity." As Silverman puts it with considerable charm, Mather preached "as if to entertain God him-self." He had what he described as a "massy" style, dense, rich in rhetorie, intricately witty — an approach that was not universally admired by the members of his Puritan congregation, who sometimes found it rather gaudy for their taste.

As the most important minister in Boston. Mather saw himself as concerned in all public questions and it was this ubiquitousness that often got him into trouble. As he put it, "a man of good merit is a kind of public enemy." He even evolved a theory of doing good as a "heroie revenge" on those who criticized him. The Salem witch trials were one of the ugliest chapters in American history, yet all through them Mather tried to understand what was actually happening. Why were people sud-denly behaving as if "possessed by the devil?" Why were they throwing fits, accusing their neighbors, voluntarily confessing to being witches? When he saw these manifestations as evidence of a diabolic conspiracy against Christianity, Mather was certainly not alim such a view. As difficult as it is to under now, the people of Salem believed in the d as much as we believe in the unconscious his comments on the trials. Mather was w between human sympathy and what he said his sacred duty. He was, for better or water man of his time.

Cotton Mather

As Silverman says, when Mather's ment and his inclination conflicted, he at a an inflammatory compromise." He was intense a man to be a good politician. Ironk ly enough, he aroused at least as much anim ity when he advocated inoculation during smallpox epidemic. In this case, a large part the public saw him as the devil. When attempted to reform church singing — to p statempted to reform church singing — to p suade his congregation to give up their " howling" and "odd noise" — he set off w Silverman calls "the angriest and longest-gued aesthetic debate in early America." Interfering in the world is an exhaust business and Cotton Mather was worn out the age of 65. Even so, he wrote a rowdy cor poem about pigeon pie shortly before he d in 1728. After a lifetime of fame and unceas work. his estate consisted of 500 acres "wasteland" valued at £36, a few pie plan lumber, a crosscut saw and odds and ends broken furniture. Most of his rewards seem have been reserved for the afterlife.

Yet few men have been so handsomely warded by posterity as Cotton Mather is Silverman's book. It is a splendid day of ju-ment, in which Cotton Mather stands radiin all his virtues and failings. He was ve mently kind and apologetically cruel. A content with entertaining God, he sometim seemed, in his incessant publications, to trying to read His mind. There's little dot that he was guilty of buhris, the sin of pribut then most great men are.

Young People Take Over

By Russell Baker

N EW YORK — It was inevitable that the baby-boom generation of the 1950s would eventually come to power in the United States, and it did. Life was bound to he different when they took over, but t was ready to adjust. "Youth must be served," they say.

l had known the bahy-boom generation from its cradle and knew it had terrible scores to settle with its forefathers, not to mention its foremothers. I also knew its Unique capacity for peevishness, especially when automobiles were

For this reason, I had my strategy ready when the company announced that Giles Conway. 29- Century" back-to-back on radio, I year-old corporate genius, was the said. Television must have really new boss of my department. Being familiar with the frustrations of his generation. I reasoned that he Pharaohs. would immediately look for a reason to fire me.

It was ohvious how be would do

"Can I ask a big favor of you?" he would inquire. "What is it, Giles?"

"Can I use the car on Saturday

Naturally, he would expect me to say, "No." after which he would chew the rug, whine that I didn't love him, and tell me I was fired. "We'll see about that. Giles Conway," I muttered as I prepared counterstrategy. It was uncompli-cated. When he asked to use the car, I planned to say, "Of course you can. And what's more, when you hring it back at 3 A.M. be sure to see if I'm sleeping soundly and, if I am, play some Rolling Stones records at maximum volume on my

Such was the scheme for holding on to my meal ticket, but they didn't call Giles Conway a 29-yearold corporate genius for nothing. Pausing at my desk, he said, Could you do me a big favor, old-

"Anything, sir. Anything at all." "Ask me if you can use the com-pany car Saturday night," he said. Here was a surprise, I asked any-how: "Can I use the company car Saturday night?"

"Absolutely not!" he roared, beaming with diabolical satisfaction. Too slow-witted to realize that he might raise my salary if I ehewed the rug and cried that he didn't love me, I could only gasp, "Why not?" "Because I'm the boss around here, and what I say goes," he thundered, and stalked off happily man.

It was soon apparent that he needed me. He invited me for dinner with five other people who had worn diapers in 1955 and started the discussion hy saying. "You're ton old ever to have watched 'Ding Dong School' with Miss Frances, I suppose."

Suppressing a suicidal urge to gloat that he was ton young ever to have heard "Chandu the Magi-cian" and "Buck Rogers in the 25th been exciting in your days. Tell me about Captain Kangaroo and the

"Don't you know anything at all?" his date said. "Captain Kan-garoo had Mr. Moose and Mr.

'And the Pharaohs," said Conway, "sang with Sam the Sham."
"Tell him about Herman's Hermits," somebody said.
"The trouble with people your age is that you don't know any history," said Giles Conway.

I asked to be excused to so listen to some Benny Goodman records, but he refused. "Sit here and listen to us, and maybe you'll learn something," he said.

By II P.M. they were reminisc-ing about adventures in the gasoline lines in the good old days of 1973 when Conway interrupted. "It's past your bedtime, mister," he said. "Go home and get into bed right away. And don't leave your light on. I obeyed gratefully. He's ordered me to come to his place next week and take a hath, I know why. He wants to be able to yell at me for making a mess of the bathroom. I'll leave a wet towel on his sofa and a pair of gym shoes on his dining table. After be blows up about that, he'll probably feel good enough to give me that raise,

Don't I worry he might read this? Come on, this is the bahy-boom generation. If it's not on television, it doesn't exist.

Daniel Boorstin's Long Love Affair With Books

By Carol Krucoff Washington Past Service

WASHINGTON — Before he-will tell you why there are 24 hours in a day or how Emperor Su Sung scheduled his 121 imperial bedmates during the Chou dynasty or any of the other "unnecessary facis whose discovery gives meaning to life," Daniel J. Boorstin wants you to know that he has written his latest epic - an acclaimed 745-page history of the world - in his spare time.

"It might sound corny or pre-tentious," the librarian of Congress announces from behind a fortresslike desk in his Washington town house, "but I insisted on my right as a citizen and as a person to go on writing despite being the full-time librarian."

After nearly a decade in this role, Bonrstin still lives in the shadow of criticism that he used federal time and staff to write his award-winning books — a charge that surfaced during his confir-mation bearings in 1975.

Riding high after winning the 1974 Pulitzer Prize for "The Americans: The Democratic Experience," Boorstin was senior historian at the Smithsonian's Museum of History and Technology when Gerald Ford tapped him for the Library post. Then senators discovered that several federal employees had done research for his Pulitzer-winner and pressed him to stop writing as a condition of confirmation.

They might as well have asked him to rip out his heart. "I don't write to make money or because I hope for prestige or to keep my job." says Boorstin, who writes each morning from 6 to 8. "I do it because I love it and can't help

He told senators then, "I will not promise not to write other books. I promise to give full attention and energy to my posi-tion." He reaffirms this promise now before the question even arises. He is still so sensitive to conflict-of-interest charges that he refuses to be interviewed on Library property, won't keep a typewriter in his offices there and Library employees' requests to autograph his books before or after official working hours.

you around his museum of a home. But since he is 69, he confines himself to pointing out a few prized possessions - Thai temple lions guarding the door, a signed New Yorker-style cartoon on the wall, a bust of Rube Goldberg in the corner - as he leads you downstairs to his scholarly

He has been awake -as is his lifelong habit - since before sunrise, writing what he will only say is "a sequel" to his latest tome. "The Discoverers." Subtitled "A History of Man's Search to Know His World and Himself." Boorsun's new best seller has been, he says, "the pleasure of my private hours over the last 15 years."

He took a circuitous route to best-sellerdom. His grandparents were Jewish immigrants, his father a Georgia attorney who helped defend Leo Frank, a factory superintendent who was accused of murdering a 13-year-old girl and was later lynched. When Boorstin was 2, the family moved to Tulsa, Oklahoma.

At 15, he left there for Harvard. A minority in a WASP nest, be launched a career that takes up nearly five times the space of most in Who's Who: Rhodes Scholar, barrister-at-law at London's Inner Temple, doctorate from Yale, author of 15 books, 25 years as a professor at the Univer-sity of Chicago and teaching stints at universides from Rome to Kyoto.

Politically, he journeyed full swing from membership in the Communist Party in the late '30s to a current reputation for conservatism and close friendships with high-ranking Republicans, although he says he belongs to no political party. In 1953, he told the House Un-American Activities Committee that his past membership in the Communist Party was the act of an errant youth and gave them names of fellow party members.

Despite his renown as an American historian, Boorstin has never taken a course in American history. "I'm an amateur historian — a refugee from the law," he seys, gleefully stuffing his pipe with Barking Dog tohacco. "When I was living in England I found that the more I lived You get the feeling that he'd ahroad, the more American I dislike to grab your band and race covered I was. That's when I de-

The result was his "Americans" trilogy and his career as a histori-

The facts Boorstin loves most he says, "are the unnecessary ones. In a way, the most important things are the unnecessary things - great poems, for example. What is most characteristic about humanity is our need for uncovering the unnecessary."

And what is most characteristic about Boorstin --- say those who know him well - is this same insatiable search for answers, this consuming curiosity about the whole husiness of humankind. As Sampson drew strength Boorstin, who devotes about a tenth of The Discoverers to the history of hooks - nearly 25 pages more than he spends on surveying the Present. He is troubled, he says, "by these hysterical people who say, "I suppose you won't be buying many books onw. You'll be buying hardware and software. This displacive notion . . . that new technology will replace the old is a fallacy. People said the tele- late and should not try to. You phone would replace the mails, marry someone because you can't the radio would replace the tele-belp it. That's what love is." graph, the TV would replace the radio. But what new technology have meshed their lives and work graph, the TV would replace the does is discover unexpected roles over the years. "Ruth is my prinfor the old. play the role they do in automo-biles?"

Boorstin, for one, still writes with fountain pen and manual typewriter. The problem with word processors, he says, is that "I change things around as I write and I like to see what I had before I made changes." Informed that this can be done on some computer systems, he says, "I'm used to writing this way."

Boorstin's goal for the Library of Congress: "Open it up, open it up." Early on he appointed a task force to find ways to shake the institution's stuffy, closed-off reputation. He ordered the great bronze front doors to be kept open and had picnic tables installed out front. He arranged public activities and scholarly gettogethers on topics from Columbus to creativity.

To encourage reading, which he likens to "the sex act — done privately, and often in bed," he set up a Center for the Book. As part of the campaign, be enlisted CBS-TV to present a "Read More About It" bibliography at the end of special programs. His Council of Scholars ferrets out the Library's areas of weakness and helps correct them. Currently, he is overseeing a Library committee on the Book in the Future, which is exploring the ways technology will affect books.

Of all the discoveries Boorstin bas made in a lifetime devoted to that pursuit, "the most delightful discovery of all," he says, is his wife Ruth. They were introduced by her brother during Christmas vacation in 1940 - she was a Phi Beta Kappa Wellesley graduate of 23 and he "a stuffy old professor" of 26 - and they married the following April.

"It was the most important de-cision of my life," he says, "and there was no reason to hesitate, The really important decisions choosing your calling and your spouse — have to be made for reasons you can't always articu-
